If you are playing golf from time to time, you must have already understood that the thing golf players call "the small game" is what you need to learn in order to improve and advance in your golf game.

The small game, like a game within a game, is all that is not the long game, not requiring woods, hybrids or low irons, is the approach game, or a small game. Putting is a huge part of this part of the game of golf, and is no less crucial than a good drive or a good save out of the rough.

Putting has a huge part of this game, it is the part that finishes all what you have done before, therefore a great drive and a wonderful iron swing will not be enough to get that small white ball to that small hole, this will be achieved by putting, and if executed well enough, you will consistently have a "two putt" game, which means that you will get your ball close enough to the hole on your first putting attempt, and that you will finish it off by putting your second try into the hole.

This is exactly why you should realize how important it is to get better in putting and better in understanding the powers that make a great putter. While confidence and swing trust are something that can be achieved and practiced without the use of a golf ball, a putter, or anything actually, a good, consistent putting can definitely be achieved by regular practice and commitment to get better.

That is why putting is the first thing you should think about when you start thinking of expanding you golfing to beyond your club, or the local golf course. If you will practice putting a few times a week, in you home or in your office, you will probably discover that you have a much better approach to putting altogether, and that you find it easier to putt and score.

Consistent rehearsal of your rhythm, you putter swing and some of the tips and tricks you learn, will ultimately give you a winning advantage over your less committed golfing friends, understand your putt and you will not arrive at the green with fears and anxieties towards that dreaded four putt.

While putting is much less glamorous than other aspects of golf, and while most men love to invest all their time and energy into making that small white ball fly a long distance and spend as much time as possible in the air, putting is what gets you results, lowers your handicap and allows you to enjoy the game more, any player that improves his putting discovers that golf has many other sides to it other than the mechanics of a swing and power of following through.

The best thing to do is to visit a few online golf shops and look at what golf training aids they have that will improve your putting, next thing is to go out and find a shop that has one of those and trying it for real, once you make up your mind its only a question of how and when you buy this golf training aid, and how committed you really are to improving your small game.
